Ampthill is composed of two separate houses placed back to back and connected by a short one-story frame passage. The older house of the two is a twostory frame dwelling which appears to have been built in the eighteenth century and extensively remodeled at about the same time the brick house was built. In its original form, the frame house was apparently a storyand-a-half structure with a side hall plan and one-story flanking wings. In the remodeling the center of the house seems to have been raised to two full stories and given a shallow hipped roof. All of the foundations were rebuilt except for that of the east wing which retains its eighteenth-century style Flemish bond foundation. The center section and the wings also received simple Roman Doric cornices matching those on the brick section. It is thought that these alterations occurred no earlier than 1830, because the three mantels on the interior are copied from the three designs for mantels illustrated in Asher Benjamin's builder's handbook, Practical House Carpenter the first edition of which was published in 1830. Although these mantels and a Federal style stair were installed in the remodeling, much of the original woodwork was left intact. This woodwork includes paneled wainscoting, raised paneled doors, chair rails, and door and window enframements.

The brick portion of Ampthill is more sophisticated architecturally than the frame portion. It is a long, single pile one-story structure covered by a hipped roof with two interior chimneys. The facade is sublty asymmetrical the principal architectural element, a one-story tetrastyle Roman Boric portico, has three bays to the left of it but only two bays on the right. The unusually large windows have six-over-six sash and flat lintels and sills of white marble. The very even Flemish bond used throughout the building is an example of nineteenth-century masonry at its best.

The plan of the latar section consists of two large rooms on either side of a large hall. At the west end of the house are two small rooms separated by a passage leading to an exterior door at that end. The interior trim is quite simple but sophisticated. Most of the moldings and trim are of Greek Revival type and appear also to have been based on Asher Benjamin's examples. The three mantels in the brick section are black marble with gold veins, and are original.

Ampthill retains several of its brick outbuildings which are to the west and north of the house. These outbuildings are all laid in American bond and all appear to date from the second or third quarter of the nineteenth century.

Ampthill began as one of the tracts on the large estate, Clifton; patented by Thomas Randolph in 1723. Clifton was sold by Randolph to Robert "King Carter, who in turn willed it to his grandson, Carter Henry Harrison. (Carter Henry Harrison is remembered as being the author of the Cumberland Resolutions -- the first publicly approved instructions for continental independence.) In 1781, Carter Henry Harrison became caught up in financial difficulties and was forced to give Clifton to his third son, Randolph. The Ampthill portion of Clifton was later purchased by Raudolph Harrison from his older brother, Robert Carter Harrison. Although Randolph Harrison took up residence in the large frame mansion at Clifton, by 1815, he apparently was considering building a house for himself, for in that year he asked his friend Thomas Jefferson to provide him with a set of plans. In September 1815, Jefferson sent Harrison a ground plan and elevation for a one-story, six room house. It is believed, however, that Harrison did not build his house until 1835, following the death of his wife, Itais said that he built then a in the hope that a new house might help him attract a new wife. site chosen for the house was the Ampthillatract, named for the Cary estate in Chasterfield County.

word of the asset The house built by Harrison at Ampthill was attached to a frame dwelling . already standing on the farm. Little is known of this earlier house, but it is thought that it was built prior to the Revolution. Architectural evidence would bear out a pre-Revolutionary date. Interestingly, Harrison made no attempt to tie the two buildings architecturally, even though the frame house appears to have been substantially remodeled about the same time the brick house was built. Although built in Roman Revival style the plan of the new brick house bore little resemblance to the plans identified by Fiske Kimball as Jefferson's copies of the Ampthill plans. Unfortunately, Jefferson's elevation for Ampthill has been lost, but it is conceivable that Harrison may have based the general outline of the house on Jefferson's scheme. As Jefferson indicated to Harrison when he sent his drawings: ". . . the elevation is merely a sketch to give a general idea. The workman, if he is anything of an architect, will be able to draw the particulars." Whether or not Jeffersen can be directly credited as the architect of Ampthill, the characteristics of his style -- whitewashed Roman details set against red brick walls, tall rectangular windows hung with dark green shutters, and compact but carefully proportioned outline -- are certainly apparent. Though long neglected, both structurally and intellectually, Ampthill is now handsomely restored and stands as a visual witness of Jerferson's architectural ideals.
